Save the war litters! Every owner of a brood sow, whether he lives on a large farm and has many, or whether he is a suburbanite and owns one, should feel a personal responsibility to see that the pig litters born this spring are received with the utmost care. That means the matter of providing proper housing for the brood sows, and their young should have immediate attention, Saving every pig possible in order that one of the most urgent war needs of the nation-more perk-enn be suppiled, should be the aim of every man who owns hogs.

The high mortality among young pigs in some parts of the country can be materially reduced if proper housing and feed are provided for the sows. Investigations of the mortality among pigs on the reclamation projects show that approximately one third of the pigs born die before reaching the weaning age. Losses on several northern projects last season were even above this average because of a severe season. According to one investigation a litter was 5%, while on farms where the Humane society's medial for his which covered about fifty herds, representing 930 brood sows, the average ber reared from each litter was only loss was about 33 per cent, while some 31-10.
